The contest “My favourite e-learning resource” received a large number of entries from our users.

The winner of the competition My favourite e-Learning Resource is Jordi Joan, a teacher at the IES Ronda secondary school in Lleida (Catalonia, Spain), for creating the website Gaudí and the technology. It is a complete introduction to Antoni Gaudí’s work and the technology used by the architect in the context of urban planning in Barcelona. The site has an attractive design, dozens of images, lots of information and several activities. It is a good example of how an educational resource can be really attractive and motivating for a wide range of users. It is also an example of the huge amount of work that some European teachers are undertaking with regard to e-learning because they are highly motivated by the possibilities offered by new media.

You can consult all the proposals received by means of the article My favourite e-Learning Resource. All the proposals put forward are extremely interesting.

This is not the first time that the elearningeuropa.info portal has run a contest and received a large number of educational resources suggested by users. The article 654 Examples of Innovative Projects Created By Youth summarises the hundreds of projects received through the Netd@ys 2004 initiative. The 2004 edition of Netd@ys related to the use of images to promote cultural dialogue, a subject of particular interest in our contemporary societies.

Similarly, the contest On-line Reading recorded a high level of participation. On this occasion our users recounted their experiences of ICT for reading. Some participants presented the websites that they have used to illustrate their on-line reading experience, and some others used the contest to introduce the sites they have developed, explaining the manner in which everyone can enjoy and benefit from them.
